

Preface

The essays collected in this Special Issue date back to the conference on “Contextual Thinking in Economics” held at the University of Siegen from September 11–12, 2019. Its purpose was to promote fruitful discussion between academics working on contextual approaches to economics, facilitating serious intellectual exchange about the viability of contextual approaches to the topics usually covered by mainstream economics. The articles published here are the result of the conference.